Egbert's mom stayed home from work to take care of him. She gave him soup and tea, and she read him stories. But nothing seemed to help. Egbert's cold just got worse.

Egbert's dad tried to cheer him up by making funny faces and telling jokes. But Egbert was too sick to laugh. He just wanted to feel better.

Egbert's sister, Lily, tried to help by bringing him his favorite toys. But Egbert was too tired to play. He just wanted to sleep.

Egbert's friends came to visit him after school. They brought him cards and gifts, and they tried to make him laugh. But Egbert was too sick to enjoy their company. He just wanted to be left alone.

Egbert's cold lasted for a week. It was the longest and most miserable week of his life. But finally, one day, Egbert woke up feeling better. His nose was no longer stuffy, his body didn't ache, and his mood was no longer grumpy. He was finally feeling like himself again.

Egbert was so happy to be feeling better. He got out of bed and went to the living room. His mom, dad, sister, and friends were all there, waiting for him.

"Egbert!" his mom exclaimed. "You're feeling better!"

"I am," Egbert said. "I feel great."

Egbert's family and friends were all so happy to see him feeling better. They all hugged him and told him how much they missed him.

Egbert was so happy to be back to his old self. He couldn't wait to go outside and play with his friends. He couldn't wait to go to school and learn new things. And he couldn't wait to spend time with his family and friends.

Egbert had learned a valuable lesson from his bad cold. He had learned that even when you're feeling miserable, there are always people who care about you and want to help you feel better. He had also learned that laughter is the best medicine. Even when you're feeling sick, a good laugh can make you feel a little bit better.

Egbert's bad cold was a thing of the past. But the memories of the love and support he received from his family and friends would stay with him forever.
