Howard was a rising star in the horse racing world. She had won numerous races and was on the verge of becoming one of the most successful female jockeys in history. However, her success came at a price. Howard's husband, Jan, was a jealous and controlling man. He resented her success and often subjected her to physical and emotional abuse.

In the months leading up to the murder, Howard's financial problems mounted. She had taken out a large loan to help her husband start a business, but the business failed and she was left with the debt. This only served to increase the tension between the couple.

On the night of the murder, Howard and her husband had a violent argument. Howard left the house and went to a nearby bar. Jan followed her and the two got into another argument. In a fit of rage, Jan strangled Howard to death.

Howard's murder sent shockwaves through the horse racing community and beyond. The trial that followed was a media circus, with the prosecution and defense painting very different pictures of the couple's relationship.

In the end, Jan Howard was convicted of murder and sentenced to life in prison. The case remains a reminder of the dangers of domestic violence and the tragic consequences that can result.

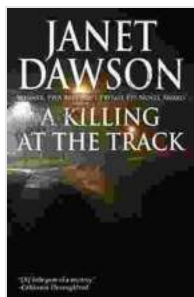

Killing At The Track is a gripping and well-written account of a shocking crime. Jones does an excellent job of bringing the story to life and shedding light on the complex factors that led to Howard's murder.

The book is a must-read for anyone interested in true crime, horse racing, or domestic violence.
